Interdisciplinary Integration: Building Criminology by Stealing from Our Friends

D. Wayne Osgood, Pennsylvania State University

Editor's Note: This paper was presented at the session "Theoretical Integration: Across Levels and Disciplines" at the 1997 meetings of the American Society of Criminology, San Diego, November 21.

In criminology, the phrase "theoretical integration" is associated with bold theoretical statements that attempt to reformulate the best known theories in our field (e.g., Elliott, Ageton, and Canter, 1979; Thornberry, 1987); and also with high level debate about the best approach to developing criminological theory (e.g., Bernard, 1996; Messner, Krohn, & Liska, 1989). In this light, my aims are quite modest. I want to argue for one simple point about integrated theories, and then I am going to use that point as an excuse for some observations about the importance of interdisciplinary work for criminology and criminal justice research. I am not going to propose a theory, or describe any work of my own. Rather, this discussion is intended to prod the field, and of course myself, to consider how we should approach our work. In the end, I want to offer some pragmatic suggestions about mundane matters such as what journals we read, what conferences we attend, requirements of our graduate programs, and what is included in our textbooks.

The title of my essay is "Interdisciplinary Integration: Building Criminology by Stealing from Our Friends," and this is essentially my version of the interdisciplinary theme President Jim Short chose for the 1997 ASC conference--which is "Crossing Boundaries and Building Bridges." I am going to try to convince you that it is best for criminology if many of us make a regular practice of academic thievery by keeping our eyes on sister disciplines to see what ideas would be useful to take for ourselves. Fortunately, in the academic world there are no sanctions against this kind of theft, as long as we cite our sources. For every type of variable considered a potential source of crime--whether it be family, community, brain chemistry, organizational structure, or labor market--there is some other group of scholars who take that topic as their primary focus. For every aspect of the criminal justice system that we find of interest, there are scholars who study comparable problems in other settings. I believe that one of the best ways to find new insights that will help build our field is for criminologists to steal ideas from these fields and bring them back to the rest of us. I am also going to suggest that we should balance our thievery with charity, by giving our own riches away to other fields whenever we have the chance.

Criminology is an inherently interdisciplinary field. There is no limit to the list of disciplinary perspectives from which one could study crime and the social institutions that address crime. There has been tremendous growth and change in criminology in the last twenty years, and one aspect of that change is our relationship to other fields of study. Specialty journals and doctoral programs in criminology are now commonplace where once they were rare. There is much that is positive about this growth, especially the increasing sophistication of the field. Yet I am especially concerned with one potential cost, namely, insularity.

Twenty years ago almost every criminologist had doctoral level training in a traditional discipline, such as sociology, psychology, political science, or economics. Now an increasing share of our new Ph.D.s are trained in departments or schools solely dedicated to the study of crime and justice. Compared to the traditional disciplines, specialized programs can offer more intensive training specific to crime and justice. Yet for that same reason specialty programs are not an especially good place to learn about anything other than criminology. That means that we run the risk of a kind of new kind of insularity in which criminology can become isolated from the disciplines from which it sprang. To fight against that insularity we need to keep an active flow of ideas to and from other fields by having many criminologists involved in those fields.

Let me turn to integrated theories of crime and delinquency to illustrate my point. As is clear from Bernard and Snipes (1996) recent review, there is now a long list of integrated theories in criminology, and they are quite diverse. I'm going to focus initially on the kind of integrated theory that I think of as most common, and these are the integrations that are reformulations of prior theories. These begin with the first integrated theory from Del Elliott and his colleagues (Elliott et

CALL FOR PAPERS

Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice

Manuscripts are being solicited for the Winter (1) 2000 special issue on "Spirituality and Forgiveness Considerations in Criminal Justice." Potential contributions should focus on any relevant topic, including, but not limited to, theoretical/conceptual discussions of forgiveness and reconciliation in criminal justice, evaluations of faith-based or restoration-based programs, and the role of moral philosophy in criminology. Manuscripts should be no more than 25 double-spaced pages in length and in APA style. Submit 4 copies (3 for blind review) along with a 100-150 word abstract. Deadline for submission is December 1, 1998. Contact: Karol Lucken; Department of Criminal Justice; PO Box 161600; University of Central Florida; Orlando, FL 32816-1600; (407) 823-6487; (407) 823-5360 FAX; email lucken@pegasus.cc.ucf.edu

Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice

The Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice is seeking manuscripts for Volume 15, number 2 (1999) whose topic is "Public Perceptions of Policing". Manuscripts should be 10-15 typed, double-spaced pages, and must meet current APA guidelines. All manuscripts are peer-reviewed. Interested authors should send four (4) copies of the manuscript by October 1, 1998 to: M.L. Dantzker, Ph.D.; Department of Criminal Justice; University of Texas-Pan American; 1201 W. University Dr.; Edinburg, TX 78539-2999; (956) 381-3566 (after 8/25/98).

al., 1979; Elliott, Huizinga, and Ageton, 1985) and also include the theoretical statements by Thornberry (1987), Pearson and Weiner (1985), and Edwards (1992). These theorists address the interplay of variables associated with well established theories such as strain, social control, and social learning: They propose combining the theories for greater explanatory power; they address the influences among variables associated with different theories; they challenge the presumed causal ordering of previous theories; they reinterpret relationships as predictable from one theory rather than another, and so on.

In other words, these integrated theories offer new positions on issues that criminologists have already thought about and studied a lot. My interest is in something these integrations do not offer, namely new topics that criminologists weren't studying before. I definitely do not mean to say that the integration of established theories is a worthless enterprise. These theories concern those variables that decades of theory and research have identified as highly relevant to crime and delinquency; so sorting out the meaning, strength, and direction of the relationships among these variables is certainly an appropriate task.

Yet as much as these efforts illustrate the growing sophistication of research on core topics in our field, they also illustrate the tendency toward insularity. These integrated theoretical positions focus exclusively on variables that criminologists were already studying, such as attachment to parents, aspirations for conventional goals, and peers' delinquency. If we ask what kind of research follows from these theories, the answer is surely: more of the same kind of research we were already doing. We may have a more complex statistical model, we may have separated some reciprocal relationships, and we may have explained a bit more variance. But we are still juggling the same set of very well established "bivariate facts."

There are many things we may ask of theories, such as consistency with the facts, logical coherence, falsifiability, and conceptual definitions suitable for research. These are all well and good, but I am concerned with another feature of theories that I think is the most critical for their value to the field: Does the theory lead to new avenues of research? Does it inspire researchers to collect data that they would not otherwise have collected and thereby generate findings about new topics? Does it lead to genuinely new knowledge, not just refinement of current knowledge? Because this type of integration looks only inward to what criminology already is, it offers us little in this regard.

I contend that what would be most useful for building criminology is outside influence. This will occur when criminologists who are well informed about our own field find good ideas from other fields of study and integrate those ideas into new theories, or at least new lines of research.

Let me give you an illustration of what I mean. Parent and peer influence are two of the most popular elements in theories of delinquency, and they appear in most of the integrated theories, typically citing Hirschi (1969), Akers (1977, Burgess & Akers, 1966), and Sutherland (Sutherland & Cressey, 1955). Though there have been many studies since those classic works, as far as I can tell the basic conceptions of parental and peer influence in criminology have remained largely unchanged for a couple of decades.

Not surprisingly, parent and peer influence are important topics in many other fields of study as well, such as academic achievement, political attitudes, mental health, and so on. Parent and peer influence are especially fundamental topics in the field of child development, and the study of adolescence is one of the most active specialties in child development today. I often attend the meetings of the Society for Research on Adolescence, which is the professional organization of this group. My wife is a developmental psychologist, and I first went accompanying her—thinking that there might be a few sessions where I could learn something useful, but mainly figuring that I could play most of the time she worked. In recent years she has complained that there are more sessions of interest to me at these meetings than there are to her. I think she is right. A substantial share of the research presented at the adolescence meetings concerns delinquency and drug use.

I see few criminologists at those meetings, but I hear about a lot of research that is very relevant to criminology. The contrast in research presented there and at the criminology meetings is instructive. Most of this research fails to meet some research standards in criminology, such as using small non-representative samples, including trivial items in measures of delinquency, and failing to control for well established correlates of crime. At the same time, I've learned that few studies in our field would pass muster in theirs. For instance, developmental researchers expect multiple sources of measurement for key concepts. Certainly the study of parent and peer influence would require either observational data or independent reports from the parents and peers. Our practice of relying on reports of a single respondent for measures of all variables would be highly suspect.

These methodological differences can challenge us to improve our own work. It is even more interesting that the body of assumptions, concepts, and "established facts" that these researchers bring to their work is often different from our own. For instance, developmentalists have looked at peer relations and delinquency from a very different angle. We long ago established that delinquency is typically group behavior, and we are especially concerned with the impact of peer group norms. Developmentalists work from a tradition of interest in the development of peer relations, and there is strong current of work focusing on acceptance and rejection by one's peers. Where criminologists have asked "who are your friends and what do they do?", developmentalists have asked "who in this school is well liked and who is rejected or ignored?" A core finding of the developmentalists is that children who are not accepted by their peers are much more likely to become delinquent. How does this square with the social nature of delinquency and the prominence of criminological theories that portray delinquency as something you catch from your friends? I don't know, but I think that criminologists could do some interesting theoretical and empirical work figuring it out. Doing so would bring something new to criminology because it involves issues that aren't part of the same old set of theories we've been tossing around for well over twenty years. Someone should go steal from these folks!

Of course, what I'm proposing is nothing new. In fact, it's easy to make the case that the most influential work in criminology has usually involved importing ideas from other fields, developing novel applications to crime and justice. Sutherland's differential association theory (Sutherland & Cressey, 1955) clearly bears a heavy debt to George Herbert Mead's original version of symbolic interactionism (1934), and Burgess and Akers (1966) used the logical framework of the psychology of operant conditioning to reformulate Sutherland's theory as differential learning. Shaw and McKay's social disorganization theory borrowed wholesale from the work on social ecology and urbanization by others in the Chicago school such as Thomas and Znaniecki (1958 [1927]) and Burgess (1925). All scholars stand on the shoulders of others. To make a silly analogy, my point is that criminology will be better off if we don't all stand on the same shoulders. The biggest advances have come when someone found some new shoulders to stand on.

This tradition of cross-specialty integration continues today as well. Terri Moffitt's (1993) typological theory has been very successful at spurring new research because it so articulately weaves together themes from the study of psychopathology, neuropsychology, life-course study of personality, and (yes) traditional criminology. John Hagan's power control theory (Hagan, Gillis, & Simpson, 1985) has spawned a new line of research connecting interpersonal relationships at the workplace and in the home to delinquency by drawing on feminist theory of patriarchy and new conceptions of class from the study of stratification. Frank Cullen's (1994) social support theory views crime from the perspective of one of the most highly developed approaches to the study of stress, coping, and mental health. These three theorists show us a different version of integrated theory--one that combines current criminological theory with ideas from other fields.

Will the data support these recent theories? Only time will tell. Even if each proves false, however, all will have made important contributions to criminology. Because they ask new questions, the answers will be new criminological knowledge, even if those answers are not the ones the theorists predicted.

So how do we cross these disciplinary or specialty boundaries? Or as I've been putting it, how do we learn to steal from our friends? It don't think it is really all that hard. I'm going to spend most of the time I have left giving you a few concrete suggestions.

One possibility is to engage in a bit of differential association, that is, to make some friends in related disciplines and hang around with them. My own main forays into this sort of integration have been a couple of papers on biology and crime (Rowe & Osgood, 1984; Booth & Osgood, 1993). Sociologist friends sometimes wonder how I ever came to engage in such disreputable behavior, and I provide the explanation that is always so popular with delinquents--I just didn't want to let down my friends. David Rowe and I have been pals since graduate school, and our criminological interests had always been quite different. David would try to convince me of the important contribution of genetics, and gradually my skepticism evolved into some fruitful conversations. We came to realize that at least some sociological theories of crime provided good accounts of how social processes would connect genetically based variation in domains such as temperament with later delinquency in adolescence. As David was writing up one of his behavioral genetic studies of crime, he decided that our discussions would make a good basis for an introduction for a paper of broader interest to social scientists. He invited me to be a co-author, and we wrote a paper that neither of us could have produced alone, especially as junior professors (Rowe and Osgood, 1984). A paper on testosterone with Alan Booth evolved in essentially the same way (Booth and Osgood, 1993). Thus, my first suggestion about how to cross disciplinary boundaries is to take an active interest in the work of colleagues who know something you don't. It's-likely that you know things that they don't as well.

My second suggestion is to keep an eye out for other academic specialties that study your topic from a different tradition. Whatever you study, some group other than criminologists studies it to. For me, this group has been developmentalists, but there is no end to the list of possibilities. If you study justice system decision-making, then you would probably be interested in the work of decision researchers found in psychology departments and business schools. If you study communities and crime, then you might get interesting ideas from community scholars in sociology, rural sociology, and political science. There is no end to the list of possibilities.

Once you find a relevant niche, there are a couple of simple things you can do to draw on the knowledge of that area. First, keep track of a few of the best journals in that field. I've found that a small investment of time in scanning the tables of contents of a few journals has led me to a handful of articles that have influenced my work a great deal. Second, go to conferences in that specialty now and then. Not only will you meet new people and learn about interesting work, but you are also likely to find that knowledge you take for granted as a criminologist is new and interesting to someone else.

Another way that we can promote the cross-fertilization I have in mind is through our graduate training. Having reached the point where doctoral programs in crime and criminal justice are common, we run the risk of insularity because many graduates will have backgrounds only in the study of crime and justice. Yes, there is an advantage in specialization, where students can gain more extensive training in criminology. But the field will not grow unless criminologists have outside expertise as well. In Penn State's Crime, Law, and Justice Program we have decided that the solution is to require doctoral students to formulate an additional specialization consisting of twelve hours of graduate course work outside of our program. These courses must comprise a coherent whole that is relevant to the students' interests in crime and justice. We are fortunate to be at a fine university where there are strong programs in many relevant areas, such as human development, family studies, organizational theory, demography, geography, economics, statistics, and so forth. We believe that students who receive training that combines in-depth study of criminology with an additional specialty will be best prepared to move criminology forward in the future.

A final avenue I have in mind for importing outside work into criminology is through the dissemination of knowledge, particularly through journals and textbooks. We can encourage friends in other specialties to send their work to our journals whenever it would fit. When acting as reviewers and editors, we can try to be open to the work of "outsiders" by valuing ideas that are novel to us and methodological strengths that aren't common in criminological work. That also means holding back on the tendency to judge harshly when authors fail to cite the work that first comes to our minds as relevant and when some of our usual methodological standards aren't met.

I also would like to see textbooks play an active role in expanding the bounds of criminology. (Yes, I think that's pretty unlikely myself, but it would be a good idea.) Text book authors could do a great service by bringing in relevant work from allied disciplines, such as incorporating pertinent developmental research in delinquency textbooks. In some cases, our texts define the field to be much narrower than it really is, as evidenced by the program of the ASC meetings. For instance, in teaching juvenile justice, I find that the texts would lead one to think that the latest word on programs to treat or

ASC Archives

The Society is in the process of establishing an archives and is calling upon its members to assist us in our search for material for the archives. If you have any material you think would be appropriate for the archives, please contact or send materials to Sarah Hall at the ASC office: 1314 Kinnear Road, Suite 214, Columbus, OH 43212.

In addition, we are trying to locate a copy of the first annual meeting program (1948) for comparison with this year's 50th annual meeting in Washington, D.C. If anyone has a copy of the first program, would you please send the copy to President Margaret A. Zahn at the following address: Dr. Margaret A. Zahn, President; College of Humanities and Social Science; North Carolina State University; 106 Caldwell Hall, Box 8101; Raleigh, NC 27695-0101.

Thank you for your assistance in preserving the heritage of our Society.

Marvin Wolfgang Memorial

A memorial has been scheduled at the ASC annual meeting in Washington, D.C. for Marvin Wolfgang on Wednesday, November 11 at 8:15 p.m.

If anyone would like to speak at the Memorial, please contact either Dr. Gerhard O.W. Mueller (973-353-1305 - gmueller@andromeda.rutgers.edu) or President Margaret A. Zahn (919-515-2468 - margaret\_zahn@ncsu.edu).

Participation, Professional Responsibility And Quality Control

Jim Short

Washington State University

In the interest of broad participation in our annual meeting, successive ASC presidents, program chairs, and governing boards have had an informal policy of "bending over backwards" in order to accept papers and abstracts submitted for program consideration. Even "ideas" of papers, without documentation, sometimes have been accommodated.

This long standing practice, together with a multitude of receptions, social events, and meetings of related groups that are not affiliated with ASC, has contributed to the growth, diversity, and high level of participation in our annual meeting. A very high proportion of our membership come each year and participate in a variety of ways.

All of this, and other common interests, combine to make our meetings stimulating and (let's face it) fun-intellectually and personally. As we have grown, however, problems have surfaced--professional, as well as logistical problems. In this brief article I want to address one such professional problem.

Each year, complaints are heard that a few panel members fail to show up when they are scheduled, or to present papers they have agreed to prepare, or come ill-prepared and stumble through presentations in a disorganized, incoherent, or unconvincing manner. For many in attendance these problems are merely annoying, but they spoil the experience of the meeting for some, and they waste a lot of people's time. Moreover, they reflect badly on the American Society of Criminology, as well as on those who fail in these ways to behave responsibly.

How widespread is this problem? As an aid to future program planning, at the 1997 meeting we asked panel chairs to estimate average attendance at their sessions, and to inform us of scheduled participant "no shows." The response rate to this request was low -- we received reports from only about 1/3 of the panel chairs. Although these reports cannot be taken as representative, the percentage of sessions at which at least one paper presenter failed to appear was astonishingly high (38%)! This clearly is unacceptable, professionally and morally.

Professional responsibility is at the heart of this matter -- responsibility to the discipline and the profession, to our colleagues and ourselves. One mark of a profession -- a defining one -- is acceptance and exercise of quality control. Exercising quality control at our annual meeting is a shared professional responsibility.

At its most recent meeting, the ASC Executive Board addressed this issue and asked that I prepare a brief statement for The Criminologist. Here, with their approval, is my report to you of what has been done, along with our collective invitation for your suggestions as to what more should be done and how we might proceed.

What To Do?

Efforts to address these issues might take a variety of forms. Without being draconian, here are a few that we hope will encourage responsible, as well as widespread participation in the program.

We have begun to enforce more aggressively the "two-appearance rule" that limits program participation (to one presentation and one other as chair or discussant). We need to remind ourselves that the rule is designed to protect against over-commitment (hence poor preparation), as well as to encourage broader participation in the program. The precise interpretation of this rule has varied from time to time, and sometimes it has been honored less in practice than in policy. In the past, the Board has elected not to impose a rigid interpretation of the rule on the Program Committee, and to give the Committee free reign in its interpretation. Time and space constraints, as well as quality considerations, now require that the rule be enforced.

The more serious problem, however, is the failure of some presenters to show up at their scheduled sessions. In this respect the Board discussed the prerogatives and the responsibilities of the Program Committee members, panel organizers, and chairs. We agreed that Program Committee members should remind panel organizers -- and they, in turn should remind panel chairs (if they are not one and the same) -- that acceptance of any role on the program entails professional responsibilities. Beyond this, Program Committee members and panel organizers have not been asked to exercise direct responsibility for the appearance and performance of program participants. Proper preparation, on-time appearance, and presentation are, of course, responsibilities of author(s) and discussant(s).

The Board also encouraged continuation of alternative types of program participation, such as the "table sessions" that were held in San Diego. These sessions were designed specifically to accommodate late submissions, although some also featured speakers who wished simply to discuss their work in a forum that did not require a formal paper.

For the most part these sessions seemed to work well in San Diego. Some professional associations routinely schedule "roundtable" or "poster" sessions that serve similar purposes. The relevance of such alternatives to quality control issues lies in the fact that they can accommodate presentations that are not quite ready for panel submission deadlines, or ideas that members may wish to try out in a less formal format than the usual panel session. Those who attend such sessions do not expect formal papers, or even fully formulated ideas, research designs, or findings. Such sessions also encourage a more free exchange of ideas than do more formally presented papers.

One of the charms of ASC meetings (and one of the great advantages to us all) is the fact that we encourage and reward participation of graduate students. Many graduate students take advantage of these opportunities. One Board member indicated that papers submitted by graduate students from his department are required to be read and approved by a faculty member. While this is surely good mentoring -- and to be encouraged -- our experience suggests that the primary problem is not with graduate student preparation or performance; rather the problem lies primarily with faculty and other professionals, a few of whom each year fail to show up or perform properly.

In order to maintain the collegial and supportive atmosphere of ASC meetings the Board strongly wishes and hopes that this matter can be resolved without formal sanctions such as are employed by some professional associations. We believe strongly that these sorts of problems are best solved by individual acceptance of personal and professional responsibility. Each of us must honor our commitments and responsibilities, as professional scholars and practitioners. We encourage response to this article, and suggestions as to who we, as a professional and scholarly society, might improve our collective professional performance.

We expect to have a more representative monitoring report from the 1998 meetings in Washington, D.C.; and, we hope, a more positive one.

Summary of the Executive Board Meeting (May 1-2, 1998)

Attending the Mid-Winter Board meeting were President Margaret Zahn, Drew Humphries, Julie Horney, Lynn Goodstein, James F. Short, Jr., Marsha Chaiken, Robert Crutchfield, Caroline Block, Robert Bursik, Jr., Chris Eskridge, Candace McCoy (Saturday), Matt Zingraff (Saturday), and Sally Simpson.

ASC is in relatively good financial shape due primarily to its strong membership, increases in meeting registrants, and Criminology sales. The association earned $14,000 from advertising and marketing last year and overall earned $58,000 in profit. An issue of concern to the Board, however, was the poor attendance in San Diego at the panels and other sessions. A number of ideas were discussed to address this situation. Former program chairs will be consulted and an article in The Criminologist will discuss the problem and potential solutions. Member input is solicited. As of January 1, 1998, the John Clark Memorial Fellowship Fund to support minority fellowships was put into place. (Three students were recommended for fellowships this year.) Lisa Maher was selected as the recipient of the Ruth S. Cavan Young Scholar Award; Charles Tittle won the Sutherland Award; Jock Young is the recipient of the Sellin-Glueck Award; Peter Greenwood won the Volmer Award; and Jim Hacker will receive the Block Award. New ASC Fellows include John Braithwaite, Margaret Zahn, Robert Bursik, Jr., and Alan Liska. The ASC office has hired a new Webmaster who will keep the web-site updated. He will take as his first responsibility to improve the flexibility of the Web version of the Directory. Other web-related issues include: (1) Criminology will now publish its abstracts on the web (authors will be encouraged to write abstracts in a nontechnical manner); (2) the Publication Committee will discuss how to evaluate the impact of the "new" abstract policy and they will come back to the Board with a report; (3) requests to put individual articles on the Web page from Criminology will use the same policy that is in effect for reprints (issue is referred to the Editorial/Publication Committee for review); (4) all doctoral programs in Criminology and Criminal Justice will be encouraged to hot link to the ASC webpage; (5) the request by Journal of Quantitative Criminology to post nontechnical summaries of their articles on the ASC webpage was approved; (6) other requests to link to the ASC will be considered individually. A new editor is sought for The Criminologist. The Board agreed to grant the editor a yearly stipend of $3,000. Washington, D.C. has been ruled out as a possible site (at least in the near future) for a new Executive Office. A new committee will be formed to investigate the costs and benefits of using the Columbus office as a potential site for an Executive Director of the ASC and the Executive Office (relative to the costs/benefits of our current situation). Matt Zingraff reported that the name of the hotel for the November meetings in Washington, D.C. has changed from the Sheraton Washington to the Marriott-Wardman Hotel. Do not be confused by the change. There are approximately 450 panels scheduled. The Association has asked Hillary Rodham Clinton and Janet Reno to speak, but neither can be confirmed until August. There will be a memorial for Marvin Wolfgang at the November meetings on Thursday evening at 8:00 pm. Philadelphia, NYC, Toronto, and Baltimore will be investigated as possible meeting sites for 2005. ASC will no longer participate in the Oral History Project. An ad hoc committee will be appointed to investigate the possibility of archiving ASC materials.

Respectfully Submitted
Sally S. Simpson, Executive Secretary

prevent delinquency are the diversion and scared straight programs of the 1970's. The standard repertoire of programs reviewed stresses classics such as the Silverlake and Provo studies and the Chicago Area Projects, from the 1940's to 1960's. Rarely do we find mention of program related research by current leaders in the field such as Patterson, Hawkins, Catalano, Tolan, Guerra, Barton, and Mulvey--even though many of these folks are active participants in ASC. I suppose that the difference is that older programs were closely associated with sociological criminology, while the current work is by cross-over specialists housed in departments such as psychology and social work. Our students need to learn about this new work, and we who teach the courses need to learn about it too. If we do not bring relevant work by others into criminology, then we run the risk that our own work will become irrelevant and that policy makers and funding sources will not see criminology as having anything to say on the topic.

I am going to finish by emphasizing another potential advantage of crossing the boundaries of disciplines or specialties, which is that it can be good for our reputations, both individually and as a field. This is what I had in mind by balancing our thievery from other fields with the charity of giving criminology away. We criminologists do some pretty good work. We have an extensive body of knowledge, a set of interesting and coherent theories, and a large bag of methodological and statistical tools. We can spread the word about our accomplishments by publishing some of our work in relevant journals of other specialties and by presenting at their conferences.

Let me tell you a story about an occasion where I was especially proud to be able to call myself a criminologist. It was a meeting of the Society of Research on Child Development, about five or seven years ago. This is the major biennial conference of all developmentalists, which boasts an average attendance of about 8,000. The setting was a large ballroom, stuffed with an audience of several hundred for a session on community context and adolescent development, and the panel included several leaders in the study of adolescence. The chair introduced the session noting that developmentalists had first recognized the importance of community context in the 1970's, that plans for the first major studies had been made several years before the conference, and here at last we would learn of the very first findings. The first speaker was not a developmentalist, however, but rather our own Rob Sampson. Rob led off by describing the relevance of Thrasher's work from the 1920's and Shaw and McKay's from the 1930's, proceeding to tie his own findings into this rich tradition of theory and research that is so central to our field. The other panel members presented some interesting work, but it wasn't very sophisticated, and it suffered from a lack of theory about community level variables. Criminology had been there already, and it was nice that one of us was on the scene to help out our friends.

So I invite you to join me in this challenge of being the kind of criminologist who is something else too--to try out this version of theft combined with charity. It has great potential both for enriching your own work and for invigorating and promoting our field.

Editor Sought for The Criminologist

The term of the current editor of The Criminologist will end December 31, 1998. Applications for Editor are being solicited by the Editorial Board of ASC. The successful candidate for Editor will be responsible for the solicitation and selection of materials, the design of each issue, and for ensuring that members receive the publication in a timely fashion. The successful candidate is also expected to guarantee support from his/her employer, in the form of secretarial assistance, expenses for telephone and postage, and other resources as needed.

The Editor of The Criminologist plays an important role in the affairs of the Society. By disseminating news and information of interest to the membership, the Editor is in a position to make a significant contribution to the professional life of the Society.

The Society is currently considering alternatives to the current format of The Criminologist, and it is likely that significant changes will be made in its production during the term of the next Editor. This may include distributing it all or in part via the Internet. The new Editor will play an important role in shaping this new product.

The best way to find out more about the position and its responsibilities is to contact the current Editor, Dr. Miriam DeLone, at (402) 554-2610, by e-mail (mdelone@fa-cpacs.unomaha.edu), or at the Department of Criminal Justice, University of Nebraska at Omaha, Omaha NE 68182-0149.

Members interested in the position should send their application by September 15, 1998 to:
